The first tiny chick

by Katrina Weaver

It wasn't too long after our family moved to the country, that we decided to get a flock of chickens. We drove to the local farm store, where the shipment of chicks had just arrived. My siblings and I went over to look at the boxes of chicks. There were several different kinds of chicks there, as well as mallard ducklings. Being of a more practical mind, my mother and father picked several chicks of good laying kinds. My sister managed to catch two mallard ducklings, and my brother selected a fluffy chick with black dots on its head. However, I was looking intently at some bantam chicks mixed in with the regular chicks.

"Daddy," I questioned. "Can I get a chick for my very own?"

"Of course!" replied my dad.

So I reached in slowly and scooped one up of the gray chicks. "Cheep! Cheep!" it shrilled loudly.

I cupped my hand over it gently, and tucked it carefully into the box with our other chicks. Soon thereafter, they were settled under a heat lamp and given chick food and water.

The chicks grew quickly and we soon moved them outside into a chicken tractor (a moveable chicken pen with no floor) where they enjoyed the luscious clover, fresh air, and space to run around. Soon the young chickens began to lay eggs, and my chick, whom I had named, Little Chick, began to make some rather unexpected noises. It sounded kind of like a crowing cough — the sound that a young rooster makes before its voice is completely developed into a melodious crowing sound. What a surprise! Little Chick was a rooster! I was quite thrilled to have a bantam rooster for my pet.

Over the course of several years, various other chickens were added to our farm. A few died of natural causes; others became tasty dinners. But many of them became special pets, chief among these being my special never-to-be-sold-or-butchered rooster Little Chick. He was my beloved pet, and I am confident that he loves me duly in return. But he was not so friendly to other members of the family. Sometimes he would fly at them in a flurry of feathers, his spurs out and beak ready. They soon learned to steer clear of him. My grandmother, while standing at a distance averred that he was "quite a character," chuckling good-naturedly.

Even though Little Chick was small, he was a natural protector of his hens. Once, our little black kitten tried to pounce on one of Little Chick's hens, but to Kitty's surprise, a furious little rooster descended upon her, spurs and beak flying. You can be sure she got out of there as fast as her shocked paws would carry her, ready to return to a cat's proper job of stalking mice.

Little Chick also shared delicious bits of food with his hens that he found while grazing. A worm, or a stalk of wheat was a wonderful treat. He would give a high shrill noise, to which the hens would come running, and gobble up the food, which he patiently kept for them until they came.

My chicken flocks have increased. Now I have new favorites among them. But none will ever take the place of Little Chick. For me, it all started with that one, tiny, cheeping ball of fluff, and then grew into more chickens, more eggs and more pets to love and take care of. Chickens make wonderful pets as well as laying fresh, healthy eggs. I would highly encourage you to get some for your own backyard. They are something that is very rewarding to raise.

Who knows? If you give chicken raising a chance, your heart may be unexpectedly stolen away by some "Little Chick."

Longing for dandelions and daffodils

by Melissa Piper Nelson

Yellow is a cheerful spring color and it signals two precursors of the season, dandelions and daffodils.

Dandelions (taraxacum) are either gleefully greeted by those persons who see (and eat) them as a healthful spring tonic, or curse the yellow, top-tufted flowers and spear-like green leaves, as nature's enemies to a perfect lawn.

Growing up in the country, we didn't so much covet lush green lawns, and welcomed the little yellow flowers dotting our front yard as messengers: The long winter is finally over and spring has sprung! We picked hundreds of small bouquets to set in glasses on the front porch or the dinner table just to remind everyone that we could actually see the front yard now that the piles of snow were gone.

To those not as fond of dandelions, the little yellow flowers represent a war of sorts. Find the enemy that dots a verdant field and destroy: flowers, leaves, roots and all! In fact, moving to a village, spring now seems to come when neighbors burst forth from their garages with pump sprayers in hand to rid everything evil, including dandelions, from their lawns.

But who among us does not remember picking up a dandelion flower turned white and spiky, blowing on the wisps and sending the seeds out into the spring air? That in itself seems like a spring ritual each generation enjoys discovering.

Daffodils, (narcissus) on the other hand, enjoy a more universal appeal. Delicate and fluted, they lift their flowers out of the late winter snow to announce a new season appearing. Daffodils are

Running to make a difference
 by Elizabeth A. Tomlin
 While other 10-year-olds were busy playing games during the month of February, the Murphy twins, 10-year-old Christopher and Giana Marie, were busy running to make a difference in the life of someone they had never met.
 "They were wanting to make a difference when they heard that their friend, Trevor Ackert's, grandmother had cancer," remarked Ann Marie Murphy, mom of the twins and elementary teacher at Canajoharie's East Hill School. "They set their goals, got sponsors, kept a log of miles, and then collected their money when they were finished."
 The goal was to run 100 miles each. Taking pledges from family and staff at school, the 5th-graders set off to achieve their goal.
 Christopher enjoyed running the path at Knox Middle School, while practicing his soccer control skills. But, it wasn't an easy feat to run the miles in February, with many school activities and some days of inclement weather. "Giana fell behind one week and had to run 12 miles one Sunday," Murphy said.
 When they couldn't run outside, they ran on a treadmill. But on several nice days the family ran together, which Ann Marie says was, "the best part."
 The twins are not strangers to running to raise funds for a good cause, as two years ago, at only 8-years-old, they ran 100 miles to benefit the late Fulton County Sheriff Garth Hillier.
 "For the Murphy kids to commit to running 100 miles and to collect donations in such a short time is amazing," said Susan Stock, recipient of the donation. "Christopher and Giana are amazing, generous, caring kids. Their parents should be proud -and I know that they are."
 The Murphy twins raised $1,200, with many pledges coming from the school staff.
 "The Canajoharie Central School faculty and staff were very generous

Coop D'etat results in deportation of rebel

by Terry Berkson

Early this spring, my reigning rooster, Geezbrook, who fathered almost all of this year's egg-laying rookies, was challenged and defeated by one of his sons. When I arrived on the scene the old man was cowering in a corner with his back facing his attacker. I scooted them out into the yard and they went at it again, Geezbrook seeming to have new heart against his son who got down like an alligator coming through a fan of feathers. They both drew blood with the old man losing the fight until I slapped them both several times with my red plastic shovel. Distracted, they headed for cover in a hedgerow.

When I went back to the coop to gather eggs I noticed that several of the hens had bald spots on their backs, caused, no doubt, by the roosters practicing their dominance. Luckily Pee Wee, my favorite chicken, hadn't suffered any damage or I would have gone after the bullies with hatchet in hand. Instead, I tried to catch them which was no easy task after they had had a taste of the shovel. I needed to know which rooster was abusing my hens so that I could pack him up and ship him off to King's every-second-Sunday auction in West Winfield. Actually, you don't need any roosters to keep the hens laying eggs. You only need them if you want to hatch the eggs. It is nice, though, to hear a rooster crow in the morning.

Geezbrook hadn't given me any trouble up until now, so I figured it was one of his coercive sons that was abusing the girls. There was no running these rebellious youngsters down, so I had to set a trap and bait it with cracked corn. The door was held open by a stick on a long string with me at the far end hiding behind a low cedar. Several times I looked over my shoulder to see my wife, Alice, at the window shaking her head in disapproval. Undaunted, I held my ground for most of the day because I knew at least one of these roosters had to go. I eventually caught the culprit that was fighting with Geezbrook and boxed him up for shipment to the block.

When Sunday came around, my wife turned down a "cheap" date to the auction, so, alone, I drove to Winfield and pushed the rebel's box across King's counter. They gave me a number, which I sat on in the bleachers. I could hear my rooster crowing, "Why me, why me?" above all the other birds in the building. Serves him right, I thought, for picking on his father. I didn't let myself get sentimental and just sat there wondering what the troublemaker would go for. The five bucks was still warm in my pocket as I headed for home. That was easy I thought. One rebel down and maybe one more to go. For a while the regime seemed secure.

A few days later I received a postcard marked from Albany. The handwriting was so scratchy I could barely make it out. It was signed by the rebel telling me that the slaughterhouse truck he had been riding on didn't make it under a low underpass and that his crate was swept onto the road where it broke into a hundred pieces. Unscathed, this bird was telling me that he was on his way back with spurs intact and a beak ready for battle. I pictured myself waiting by the coop with the red shovel in hand. At all costs, Geezbrook would still rule the roost.

Then Alice slyly looked me in the eye and handed over the rest of the mail.

popular enough to be chosen as positive symbols for charities, represent new hope and awakening and be immortalized in poetry. William Wordsworth wrote of them, "fluttering and dancing" in the breeze much to his delight. And, one doesn't usually pick or purchase a single daffodil, but bunches of them. The more in a bunch, the more intensely beautiful the picture.

Homeowners don't seem as adverse to the delicate yellow daffodils fluttering about their landscaping either. Instead, bragging rights are unleashed when the first patches of the flowers peek out of the snow and decorate barren flowerbeds.

Little yellow flowers are harbingers of spring. We either love or hate them, depending on the variety, but we cannot deny their presence, or their message. Spring is on the way!

"Thumbtack Rated Us" The #1 DJ Service in the Mohawk Valley!

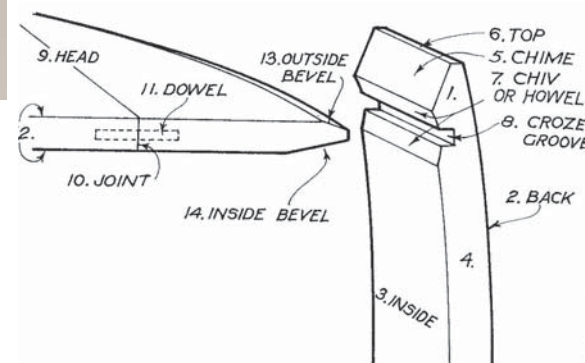

Whatchamacallits

Continuing with our cooperage theme, this week we have a grouping of three unusual tools created specifically for the barrel maker. This particular group was manufactured in the 19th century and are: a barrel croze plane (top); a leveler plane (left) and a howell plane(right).

The croze is the groove that runs around the inside of the top and bottom of the cask which held the head in place and is cut using the croze plane or cooper's router.

As you can imagine using this tool requires a lot of strength. The cooper has to cut the groove straight and at a uniform depth while working on a slope inside a circular container. The leveler plane was used for leveling the ends of the oak staves — the slats that make up the barrel sides — once they were held together with the hoop. Our last tool, the howell plane was actually used before the croze plane to make a howell (or lip, if you will) around the inside of the barrel. The croze is made afterward in order to hold the head (barrel end).

There is a fascinating video on YouTube called Making barrels for Guinness in old times that shows similar tools (and more) in actual service

Do you have your own Whatchamacallit?

Four ways to make your vehicle more eco-friendly

Many new vehicles are made with the environment in mind, as more and more drivers are embracing eco-friendly features that reduce the carbon footprints of their vehicles. But motorists need not purchase new cars to make their driving habits more environmentally friendly. The following are a handful of steps drivers can take to protect the environment regardless of how new or old their vehicles are.

1. Maintain your vehicle.

Even if your car or truck has no eco-friendly features designed to reduce fuel consumption and cut down on emissions, that does not mean the vehicle cannot be more fuel-efficient or produce fewer emissions. Adhering to the maintenance schedule recommended in your vehicle owner's manual can conserve fuel and cut back on potentially harmful emissions. Well-maintained vehicles burn less fuel, as they don't force engines and other components to work as hard during operation as vehicles that have not been taken care of. Replace worn down or dirty spark plugs, which misfire and waste fuel, and fuel and air filters once they are no longer operating at peak capacity. Address any issues that arise with your vehicle's emissions systems immediately, visiting your mechanic if the vehicle seems to be sputtering or emitting any abnormal fumes.

2. Slow down.

Driving above the speed limit is not just dangerous but potentially harmful to the environment as well. According to the United States Department of Energy, each five miles per hour drivers drive over 50 miles per hour is akin to adding an additional $0.14 per gallon for gas. That's because driving above 50 miles per hour is far less fuel-efficient than driving below that figure. So slowing down when posted speed limits mandate driving 50 miles per hour or slower is not just safer and more eco-friendly, it's better for your wallet as well.

3. Keep cargo off the roof.

When you must haul cargo, keep that cargo in rear-mount cargo boxes or the backseat or trunk of your car rather than the roof. Rooftop cargo boxes make vehicles less aerodynamic, reducing highway fuel economy by as much as 17 percent according to the U.S. DOE. By comparison, rear-mount cargo boxes reduce highway fuel economy by just 2 to 5 percent. If you haul cargo in your trunk, remove items when your trip is complete, as excess, unnecessary weight in the car will reduce its fuel efficiency.

4. Inspect the gas cap.

Few drivers may think to examine their gas caps while filling up at the pump, but such an inspection may reveal cracks or other damage that are wasting fuel. When gas caps are cracked, loose or damaged, fuel can escape gas tanks as a vapor, wasting fuel and contributing to emissions. If the cap is in need of replacement, consult your mechanic, the dealer who sold you your vehicle or the vehicle manufacturer.
